I love social media, I really do. I think a person can get a lot out of a specific niche through either TikTok videos or Instagram reels. For example: travel. Instagram has become one of the main sources of information when it comes to vacation or travel inquiries. On the down side, while these travel inspired instagram reels can appear as flashy and visually appealing, they do not always depict an accurate picture and can sometimes lead to overtourism and inaccurate advertisement highlighted by various creators of digital marketing for travel. Hi, my name is Sean!

Mine is Chase

This is Jacob

And Brennan, and this is "Reel Travel." So to kick off our conversation about the different accounts that we focused on, let's introduce them and then we can dig a bit deeper into the content itself. My account was named "Traveler", an instagram account boasting 2.9 million followers and 904 posts. This is what most would consider a large creator. The content that the account posts is all photos and videos of different travel destinations spanning a wide range of locations from Finland to Morocco.

Hearing about the Traveler account with almost three million followers puts into perspective how influential travel pages on Instagram can be. Accounts that large are clearly built around visually appealing destinations that inspire people to travel, which I also noticed when looking at Helene in Between's content. While Helene's account is smaller, with around a million followers, she still has a significant reach and promotes many of the same types of visually attractive European locations. The difference is that Helene presents herself more as a travel guide or lifestyle expert rather than just a page sharing destinations. She often gives advice about living abroad, comparing life in Europe to the United States, and encouraging followers to imagine themselves living in these places. Because her content mixes personal advice with visually appealing travel clips, it can feel more trustworthy to viewers. However, just like the Traveler account, her posts still highlight the most aesthetic and appealing parts of a location, which supports the point that travel content on Instagram can prioritize attractive imagery and engagement over showing the full reality of a destination.

It's nice that Helene is more engaged with her audience as a travel guide. I chose to look at Caiden Jackson's content on his Instagram, @caidenjacksontravel, which has both aesthetically pleasing content that Traveler has and content where he talks about his journeys. Caiden is an enjoyer of traveling and spends his everyday exploring the world. He is also a videographer so he documents all the places he goes to and posts it on his Instagram. One of his pinned reels, reels that he chose to place at the top of his page, was about Caiden's backstory of how he started this journey, as well as how he is able to continue traveling nonstop without too much concern. He has already been traveling full time for 3-4 years and it appears to have been very successful for him. As a kid, Caiden was into adventure and videography, and this combination of interests along with COVID moving his classes online caused him to drop out of college and explore the US. His plan was to film his travels and document them on social media, and hopefully he would be making enough money from viewership or brand deals. Now he says he is making enough money to fund all his travels and to afford luxury hotels. I thought the reel had good storytelling and I think it reveals how transparent and personal he is willing to be with his audience. He recognizes how blessed and lucky he is considering the risky decisions he made.

That's great to hear, but my account was slightly different. It didn't nearly have the same personal touch as Caden Jackson's. I focused on an account called Travel and Leisure. It had several reels such as best travel destinations for couples, honeymoons, safe destinations in Europe, but it seemed to be far more commercialized and focusing on things such as things that could be paid for destinations and, frankly, commercial things. I think the content on there was very catered to look nice, to be eye-catching, and evoke a sense of luxury. But yeah, not nearly the personal touch of someone like Caden Jackson's. That sounds great. Going back to more of a personal touch type of account,

I initially stumbled upon Harrison's, or @worldgeoo, page because his profile picture was of him aura-farming in front of a mountain, so I had to look deeper into it. His second hook was that he had "[cross emoji] Everything down below is done by the Grace of God," in his bio, and with me being a Christian as well, it made me want to see what exactly was "down below." After scrolling through his account for a couple of minutes, I started to notice a bit of a theme. It seems as if he really only reviewed US national parks and/or monuments. He has like 50 thousand videos of where he just is ranking the parks or monuments from worst to best, or "last to first" (you'll see why that's important later). He posts the most gorgeous images of whatever place he's talking about, and has a very charming and welcoming personality. So overall, that's the outline of his page.

Chase: Now that we've introduced the accounts, did any of you guys notice any themes in the content you analyzed?

One thing he does really well is creating aesthetically pleasing and peaceful content. Caiden's reel about his backstory was just of him talking, but the outdoor setting was pleasingly colorful and the guitar in the background made it soothing to watch. Even his advertisement for Adobe

Premiere was filled with beautiful locations of lakes or forests with different shot distances and angles. The jazzy music in the background and warm lighting add to the overall coziness. After scrolling through many of his reels, I realize that the majority of them have no talking at all. They have the pattern of putting some text on the screen such as “life in the italian alps” or “quiet mornings in the mountains” and then playing shots of his trip while keeping the text on the screen. I think it is a clean format that is effective for the aesthetics he is aiming for. The reels where he does talk in the background about his travel and observations still keep the same cozy vibe. The visuals for this type of content are so satisfying and create a calming atmosphere. Again, the shots are mostly quite short so I am unable to immerse myself within a singular shot, but his goal seems to be giving a summary of his travel through rapid-firing scenery, which can demonstrate both a cohesive theme of a place or the diversity of one.

That's very interesting, Jacob. I found that Traveling Leisure also presented it in a very similar way. Many of the reels, too, had this soothing sort of music. I can't say necessarily they were all jazz, but very soothing. The vibe, it did feel maybe a little bit artificial, but again, it was very, very relaxing, sort of evoking a sense of luxury. The B-roll was very nice, too. Maybe, again, not so personal. I think much of it might have been stock footage, but very nice, beautiful imagery and much of it presenting, again, maybe commercialized, but very, very nice destinations. You know, resorts in the Alps or nice, nice beaches, you know, in Mexico. That's it for me.

Brennan can ask the next question

What Type of places did they advertise?

The places that the account primarily advertises depend on the time of year, with most of the recent videos featuring Finland, Norway and Germany in the winter. These are all some of the pretty times of the year in these places with the snow on the ground and the warm lights coming from houses being so welcoming. There are also videos of places like the Sahara Desert in Morocco where there is a camel in the video to show the transportation method and there is just the desert for as far as the eye can see. Some videos capture the elegance of New York or Los Angeles which are much bigger cities and not some nature tourist location, but more viewed as cities that have a wide variety when it comes to travel. I would say that the majority of the locations present in the reels are beaches where the video is taken during a magical sunset over the water and makes the location look like the perfect destination for a vacation. The common thread of how all of these places were that it was just the coolest parts being shown in the videos which can lead to travelers wanting to visit since they only see the fascinating parts from the account. This leads to overtourism in locations like the ones mentioned.

That's riveting that the Traveler account promotes a wide variety of visually appealing destinations because in a similar way, Helene in Between also highlights places that look especially charming and desirable. With Helene, the types of places she advertises are a bit more specific. Most of her reels focus on European cities and smaller towns, especially in places like Germany, Italy, France, Spain, England, and Switzerland. Instead of dramatic landscapes or beach sunsets, she often shows everyday experiences like walking through city streets, sitting at cafés, or trying local food. The goal seems to be showing what life might feel like living there, not just visiting. She frames these places as charming, walkable, and part of a slower lifestyle. But similar to what we were talking about earlier, she still focuses mostly on the most appealing parts of those locations. Because she has a large audience of a million followers, that constant promotion of the same kinds of destinations can influence where people want to travel, which connects back to the point that flashy travel reels can sometimes contribute to overtourism.

Well, the thing I noticed right off the bat is how niche this guy's content was. It is definitely targeted for a specific audience, which is those who don't want to leave the US. Like I said before, he really only talks about two things, but just in like 30 different fonts, and it's US national parks and monuments. He doesn't really escape those topics, so his page tends to get a bit repetitive and predictable. But for those who are trying to hit every park and monument this country's got, then Harrison is definitely the guy for you. Right now, he's doing a series where he highlights one of the national parks that he's been to a day, and then gives us the Sparknotes on it. With that being said, I wish he would incorporate a bit more of his own personal experience when telling us about the national parks. He does give us a lot of info regarding its history, what there is to do there, as well as providing pictures of the park, but it's lowkey nothing that I can't just look up on Google. The thing that is special about having real-life creators make content like this is that they don't HAVE to just give us the facts, they can share their own experience too: positive AND negative. That way, we're not totally blinded by broad social media expectations that may not align with everyone's experience.

Honestly, it's quite random. Caiden is the one who runs the show, so wherever he wants to go is where he'll go and the audience will just come along for the ride. This makes sense because it's not like the audience is asking him to visit and take pictures of a specific place they want, so I think this is a great way to run the channel. As long as Caiden is documenting what he is seeing and utilizing his strong videography skills, the audience will enjoy whatever he puts out. From the reels I've seen, pretty much every continent is included in his travels. He has gone to Kyrgyzstan, which is in Asia, Guatemala, which is in Central America, Peru, which is in South America, Rwanda, which is in Africa, and Norway, which is in Europe. I'm sure if I look further I'll find places from North America and Oceania as well.

I think that's really awesome because honestly, looking at some of my reels, it felt like, like I touched on this again earlier, very artificial. I noticed several of the pages, several of the reels were sponsored and with, you know, captions such as like safest resorts in 2025 or, or safest countries to travel to or best destinations in Europe. A lot of these lists ended up featuring highly traveled, commercialized again, destinations.

It seemed like it was very, very much optimizing for, you know, rather than something like adventure, it really seemed to optimize for like cultural friction and like stability and, you know, something that's very... rather than targeting some niche, it seemed to be more for the masses and to sort of like push this again, like commercial agenda. The destinations off the top of my head were places like the Alps, Switzerland, Mexico. You know, they weren't some niche or very spontaneous like, like Caden. But I don't want to touch too much on, on,

Who wants to ask this question?

“What is the audience of the reels?”

- Do they use trending audio, or mostly original sound?
- What do the comments suggest about their audience?

The audience of the reels is variable. At first thought, the audience would only be people who have the budget to travel and actually go to these places, but I believe that the audience is more broad than that, and stretches beyond the people who can afford the vacation, but also people who might aspire to visit these places once they make more money. I think that this is the more broad audience since there weren't videos that would narrow the scope down, so I think that this channel is trying to reach both groups. In addition to this it can also apply to people who just find the videos of the locations gorgeous and they want to interact with the videos which can boost the account. This never uses the original sound of the videos, and instead utilizes popular music that is played in the background of the reel. I believe that this choice is to incite a feeling of joy and happiness in the viewers that music has the ability to do more so than just the original sound on the video might have. Utilizing popular music created a difference in what is presented in the reels and what the experience at these locations is, and thus emphasizes another way that this account does not accurately depict the travel destinations. The comments on the videos vary reel to reel. For example, a reel that portrays a snowy wonderland in Norway has comments from the official Oslo, Norway, and Scandinavia instagram accounts in addition to other travel influencers. There are also random people who react to the video sharing a story of the location, or just admiring the beauty. The comments are usually an emoji that emphasizes the commenter is amazed by the beauty, or a short comment like “wow” or “beautiful”. These comments are not important and don't offer more in-depth perspectives, so they did not add a more unique vantage point that would bridge the gap between the real world and what was presented in the reels.

So the Traveler account seems to attract a broad audience, but Helene in Between's audience is somewhat similar but also more specific. Her reels seem to target young to middle-aged adults, often people between their mid-20s and 50s who are interested not just in vacationing but potentially living abroad or adopting a European lifestyle. A lot of her followers appear to be Americans who are curious about traveling or relocating to Europe, especially since many of her videos compare life in the United States to life in countries like Germany, France, or Italy.

Unlike the Traveler account, Helene often uses original audio, where she speaks directly to the camera or narrates the video herself instead of relying on trending music. This makes her content feel more personal and informational, almost like she is giving advice rather than just showing scenery. Because she talks directly to the audience, her reels feel more like short travel guides or personal insights rather than purely aesthetic travel clips. The comments on her reels also suggest that viewers see her as a source of advice. Many people ask questions like how to move abroad, how expensive certain cities are, or what steps they would need to take to live in Europe. For instance, any time her followers comment questions she dms them her travel guide which includes how to plan and travel throughout a certain city. This shows that her audience is not just watching for entertainment but is actively learning about the lifestyle she presents. On the downside, when viewers take these reels seriously as guidance, the highly positive portrayal of these destinations can shape expectations and encourage more people to travel to (or even attempt to move) to the same locations she promotes

The audience is literally just anyone who wants to relax by looking at beautiful pictures of different places around the world, and there are probably some people who enjoy his commentary on these places as well. I think everyone can add some peace into their life by watching a few of these videos. The comments are wholesome and overwhelmingly positive; they include many heart or star emojis and lots of encouragement from viewers telling Caiden that his clips are beautiful and make their day.

I think unlike Camden's diverse content, mine really seemed to cater a lot towards young couples and maybe new families, you know, perhaps newlyweds going on a honeymoon. A lot of the captions and the lists that were compiled seemed to really focus on, you know, safe destinations, romantic destinations, you know, things of the sort. Somewhere where you don't want to worry about shock and excitement, but rather just might want to, you know, relax a little, get away from work, get away from, you know, get away from your maybe day-to-day troubles and just relax a little. Yeah, my comments on my videos weren't anything too interesting. In a later question that we have, I think I'll talk more about how Harrison engages the audience. But, no, same as kind of Brennan and Jacob,

Similar to Brennan and Jacob, the comments on Harrison's videos are also very shallow, but I talk a bit more about that in a later question we have. Another question that crept into my brain, and I'm sure did for y'all too, but as I was surfing his page, I was wondering if he had any "second source of income." The way a lot of these somewhat small creators tend to make a good chunk of their money is through either sponsorships or brand deals. Monetization is a huge money-maker for content creation in today's day and age, so I looked through Harrison's profile to see if he's being sponsored by any travel companies or anything like that. I had no luck in his reels, but I saw that he linked his Linktree in his bio which had an outdoor clothing brand company, as well as a bunch of charity organizations for the planet in there. I think that's so cool! The only thing is that I wish he would advertise those more in his actual videos, especially the charity ones, because they're kind of hard to find tucked away at the bottom of this bio.

Viewing these reels, I could not see any reels that were advertisements for brands or companies. This means that they were not making money off ads, but they could have been making money from instagram in other forms. This is a plus in my eyes since it just was the content that I would want to see if I searched up an account like it. The value proposition that this account emphasized was the inspiration to visit these places due to the unique nature that was pictured without ad content that most other accounts have.

I'm glad none of your reels were clear advertisements, on the other hand when it comes to monetization, Helene uses it as a clear part of her business model. A lot of her posts include direct promotions for her own products, like her travel guides, her travel book, or even cruises that she hosts. So while the reel itself might look like a casual video about a destination, it's often also acting as a form of advertising. Even when there isn't an obvious brand sponsorship, she'll include captions like "comment guide" or "comment cruise," which then sends followers a link to a product she's selling. Because of that, the reels present her as a travel expert who can show people how to recreate the same experiences she's having. This position helps drive engagement and sales, but it also connects back to our thesis, because when travel content is tied to monetization, creators have a stronger incentive to show destinations in the most appealing way possible rather than giving a fully realistic picture of what traveling there is actually like.

He also discusses the importance of his brand deals and how they help him fund his comfortable hotels during travel. He posted a reel on his account advertising Adobe Premiere, where Caiden shows off its features and how he creates his reels with it. As a videographer, it makes sense why he would need a convenient editing software for all the clips he records. He claims he gets all of his work done on his phone by just using Premiere, which I am skeptical about as content creators often exaggerate for the brand deal. However, I do appreciate that he created a separate reel for his brand deal instead of interrupting one of his other travel reels with a sponsorship, as is often the case with short-form content.

Type of content lowkey skip this?

- What niche are they clearly targeting? (Luxury, budget, adventure, aesthetic, solo travel, etc.)
- Food/culture blogging
- History
- Recommending travel destinations
- Travel guide?

The type of content that this account used was mostly outdoor nature with lots of views sometimes overlooking a city, or on the beach, or even just walking through a pretty area. This account also had a few reels, I would say one in every eight that included words on the video which would be a phrase along the lines of “imagine me and you in Barcelona” or “we need to travel here” which were prompting the viewer to send these reels to someone that they would want to visit these places with, and thus the reel gains more views and this boosts the algorithm. Another part that I enjoyed about this content was that not all the places were super well known travel destinations. There were more obscure locations like Romblon which is a province of the Philippines or Busan, South Korea which I feel that both these locations aren’t typically major tourist attractions. My favorite video on the account was of a waterfall 30 minutes from my hometown in Oregon that is one of the most pretty places that I have been. And this video has 1.3 million likes! I view this as a net positive for the location and in my opinion it brings more attention to my hometown which I enjoy.

That account seems to focus a lot on nature and scenic landscapes, while Helene’s content shifts more toward everyday lifestyle travel in cities. Instead of waterfalls or big outdoor views, a lot of her reels highlight cafés, local restaurants, street markets, and just walking through European neighborhoods. So while both accounts are showing travel destinations, Helene’s niche feels more like lifestyle and informational travel rather than just visually appealing travel. Her content has food, culture and destination recommendations, and a lot of the reels almost work like mini travel guides where she explains why to visit a certain city is or what makes living there appealing. In a way, similar to how the account you mentioned encourages viewers to imagine themselves traveling to those places, Helene often frames her videos in a way that encourages viewers to picture themselves actually living that lifestyle abroad. That’s what makes her content feel less like a scenic travel page and more like someone giving advice on how to experience those destinations.

To give better examples of his strength in aesthetics, we can look at one of his pinned reels of his experience in Kyrgyzstan. The reel is composed of several short clips of different places and activities in Kyrgyzstan strung together. There is beautiful camera work for shots of mountains and horse riding. I like how there’s no talking and just some singing in the background because it allows me to focus better on the shots. This content does demonstrate a tradeoff between aesthetics and reality however. I have never been to the places he has traveled to but can guarantee there is no background music when you go. I wish I could just hear the sounds of the place instead, including the breeze or the animals, because that gives a more accurate picture. Also, since the clips seem to be the best looking highlights, but traveling is an activity with ups and downs, and with a range of emotions, none of which are captured in any of his reels. I’m not trying to say his content is bad because I actually think it’s quite good and shows what Caiden’s aim is when making these reels, but I’m just noticing how in order to meet the audience’s needs he has to edit his content a certain way to fit a vibe that only shallowly portrays the place he is in. To summarize, for most of his reels the only thing I learn is that X location is really pretty, and that can get boring pretty fast. It works as a stress reliever but that’s about it.

- What did they do to engage the audience
  - How strong is their hook in the first 2–3 seconds?

■ Do they rely more on scenery shots or themselves on camera?

Moving on from the content itself, let's take a closer look at who our accounts are trying to reach as the audience and how they engage them.

For "traveler", the covers of the videos are breathtaking as well as the videos themselves which pan to the view of wherever they are and have the power to draw anyone in. There are not usually people in the forefront of the videos and there are never people talking about the locations or the pros and cons of the destination, it is just the views that promote the account and the location. I think that this is a beneficial method for this account to use, since it differentiates it from other accounts and can leave views up to interpretation without a narrator inserting their opinions or just overly explaining the content. This supports our thesis since it leaves the interpretation up to the viewer of the video and can allow for an incorrect view that the viewer may develop of the location in question. This can lead to misinterpretation of the video and prompt people to want to visit the location, thus leading to possible overtourism.

I think that's a compelling point, especially because my creator engages her audience in almost the opposite way. Instead of relying only on visuals, she's usually front and center in the reel, either talking directly to the camera or narrating what's happening. She also tends to use strong hooks in the first few seconds to pull viewers in, which sometimes can be a little bit of a clickbait. For example, she'll start a reel dramatically like "Germany is so dangerous," and then the video flips that expectation by showing her calmly eating food. That kind of opening grabs attention and encourages people to keep watching. She also engages viewers through the captions by asking them to comment phrases like "guide" or "cruise," which increases interaction and helps boost the reel in the algorithm. So while the account you talked about relies on letting the scenery speak for itself, Helene actively guides the viewer's interpretation through narration and storytelling. But in a way, both approaches, whether it's visual content or storytelling, can create a tuned up version of a destination that doesn't always reflect the full reality.

These reels do hook the viewer with beautiful imagery and relaxing music, but it is largely, at least more so than some of the other pages here, it is largely informational. So what really seems to be bringing a lot of people back, they may be hooked by the images, but really what seems to be bringing them back is, I guess, I suppose, this content. And I imagine it is a reliable source of places to visit.

**cut here

He starts this one (Kyrgyzstan reel) by saying, "One of my favorite countries that I've ever been to is a country right here in central Asia called Kyrgyzstan. Let me show you why." These are the only words said in the reel and it works as a decent hook, since the viewer wants to see the "why". The rest of the reel has a simple goal to show, not tell. For most of his reels, however, he does not really need his words to hook the audience because the camera work speaks for itself.

There is definitely a heavy reliance on scenery shots rather than himself, though he will have some nice shots of himself within the scenery.

Speaking of just that, the next thing that I looked at was his followers and views. I would say he has a moderate number of followers with 36.9k. Not crazy but definitely more than me, but then I took a look at his views and I was honestly kind of shocked. He only had an average of about 4,000 views per reel, which again is not terrible compared to someone like me, but for someone with that amount of followers I would've guessed an average of AT LEAST 10k. And not only that, some of his posts had like 50-60 likes, and ZERO comments. I was like there has got to be a reason he's not getting the traction he probably is looking for. His reels are maybe 30 seconds max in length, so I thought maybe it could just be peoples lack of attention span. But out of curiosity I scrolled back to see what his most viewed reel was, and it was a video of him, physically him, hiking through Ohio's Ledges trail while talking about HIS EXPERIENCE, even saying things like, "The first mile was pretty tedious and uneventful, BUT positive thing, positive thing, positive thing." And this had 148K views! Are you picking up what I'm putting down? People were drawn to this one because it was different from the typical standing in front of his map and telling us the Wikipedia synopsis of the different version of the thing you told us about the day before. I'm being hyperbolic on purpose, but don't you see what I mean? Harrison in that video was being active, true to self, and informative all at the same time. With all that being said, people's lack of being able to focus on something for more than 5 seconds may also be a factor.

- Brennan can ask this
- What is one missed opportunity we see?
  - If we were consulting this creator, what would we change?

One missed opportunity that I could see with this account would obviously be the monetization aspect of it, since that is a way that the account would be able to make more money, but I do respect the creator for not utilising company advertisements for any of the videos. These companies could also make some extra money by reaching out to travel destinations and post great videos of those places which would use their platform to push more people to visit these possibly more niche places. Other than that, the account is the perfect travel account that I would want to follow and interact with, so I do not have any different methods that I would enact if I ran the account.

Yeah Brennan, I completely agree. I also would have very little critiques. What I would tweak about Harrison's page is something that might be a bit more personal to me, so just bare with me. I mentioned earlier that he has a Christian tagline in his bio that says "Everything down below is done by the Grace of God." Being a Christian myself, I would've loved to see him talk about how Christ affects everything he does in his travels, because it's one thing to say something like that as a blanket term, but to put some specificity and intimacy behind it is another.

**cut here

That's a touching point Sean. Ironically once again, Helene's account has pretty much the opposite situation to yours Brennan. While the account you're talking about might be missing monetization opportunities, Helene's content is already heavily tied to monetization through products like her travel guides and other products. So the missed opportunity I see in her content isn't about making money but more about transparency and balance in the information she presents. For example, she often promotes smaller European towns and encourages followers to visit or even move abroad, but she rarely talks about the possible downsides, like visa complications, housing issues, or how increased tourism can affect local communities. Because her reels reach a large audience, (having a million followers and getting millions of views) even a short discussion about those realities could make the content feel more balanced. Adding that kind of perspective wouldn't necessarily make the reels less engaging, but it would give viewers a more complete picture of what travel actually looks like.

**dima update paragraph w/ transcript

**cut here

Maybe not so much a missed opportunity, but I think a massive shortcoming of travel and leisure is the misrepresentation of travel that comes with over-monetization. Many of the reels blatantly advertise things. They optimize for high spending, advertise things, and just really try to peddle products. One particular reel that stuck out to me was just, frankly, a blatant advertisement for these weird you know dividers that split up your airlines you know your plane seats to i don't even know what for to you know prevent you from getting sick to to serve us some sort of privacy i simply i don't believe it works um i can't imagine it being helpful but nevertheless travel and leisure you know really peddled us to its consumers you know if i was behind traveling leisure i don't think i would even believe you know this was a worthwhile thing to do but this over monetization in this specific case, just simply ruins much of the content. It makes the content far less enjoyable, but also makes it seem like it's necessary to spend all this money on, frankly, pointless products on overpriced hotels and overpriced resorts. The content presented by Travel and Leisure is very one-dimensional and you know, really misses out on the cultural exploration, architectural arts and food that you might be exploring otherwise.

There are quite a few things I would improve in his Kyrgyzstan reel though, and these can probably be applied to more reels generally as well. The cuts between shots were very fast and in order for me to really understand what was going on I had to pause or backtrack. Additionally, I thought some of the more interesting shots were way too quick, especially the one man staring down an eagle. Although pausing is an option, Caiden is a videographer, not a photographer, so I would like to enjoy his video content instead of staring at still frames like a photobook. The entire reel was only twenty seven seconds long, so it would definitely be reasonable to extend some of the shots. The less interesting shots were just of his travel partner, and there were too many of these. I definitely understand wanting a few shots of your friend but there were too many. I would rather have more focus on the view than just the guy. This critique is more specific to that reel though, and obviously it is his choice how much he wants to include his friend.

*Some sort of conclusion, with all of us saying our names again*

Brennan can intro the conclusion then we can all say goodbye "Reel Travel."
